Not illustrated. 1876 edition. Excerpt: ...his surety except his brothers, but in these war times he would not ask them. Hall proposed that he should go out to the house of his brother James, and ask him to become surety; as all the other notes of his wife were secured, Lafayette assented, and Hall at once started towards James Houghtons house. James Houghton and Hall are both dead. No witness was produced to tell what occurred when the parties met. But the suggestion spontaneously arises that when Hall got to the house, he narrated the interview with Lafayette as explanatory of his visit, and requested that he would sign the note as surety, and that he complied. If A. declares that he is presently going to apply to B. to do a particular thing, upon a certain reason or motive, and B. does it, it is not a strained deduction (in the absence of other proof) that B. acted upon the inducement or representation made by A. This view of the testimony would tend to the inference that there were no other motives for signing except such as were expressed in the conversation between Hall and Lafayette. If James signed in response to the application of Hall, as contemplated by him and Lafayette, then there was no new valuable consideration between the parties; if he signed for other reasons, they have not been shown. We have then the signature of James to the paper which conferred a right upon Mrs. Hall to write over it a guaranty to pay the sum of money due upon the note; if the guaranty was assumed upon a consideration, and that is shown, the contract is valid, otherwise it is nudum pactum. In Thomas v. Jennings, 5 S.& M., supra, Thomas, not being payee, wrote his name on the back of the note, the court held that It required explanatory evidence to determine in what character he meant to...
