

The Future of ADR - The More Like Litigation Conundrum

Much has been written bemoaning how arbitration has been increasingly becoming more like litigation in court. The symptoms have been more motions practice (motions to dismiss, motions for summary judgment), more discovery (depositions in addition to document requests), and more. Yet there has been little exploration as to what is fueling this trend. By understanding what is behind it, we can think more intelligently how to counter it or not. The authors recent experiences in several cases with California's judicial reference process suggests how businesses can structure in their contracts an ADR process that reigns in the excesses of the more like litigation trend while addressing the concerns that drive that trend.
