

Station colours: The expanded and updated third edition.

This book is intended to give accurate, easy to use information for those modelling and restoring railway structures. There is a vast array of information about locomotives and rolling stock, but building colour schemes have been neglected by authors and publishers so that you still see preserved lines with totally inaccurate building colours which modellers then go on to copy, thus perpetuating the mistake to the extent that it can become accepted as correct. I hope that this book will help to put an end to such practices; along with the information on the colour schemes used by the railway companies, I give BS numbers for the correct shades and a list of the appropriate model paints to use. There is also a colour patch showing the colours used, and as many illustrations as I can find showing well restored buildings that are in the correct colours. In fact railway companies were very conservative when it came to painting their buildings; most simply went for the cheapest paints which meant various shades of cream, buff, stone & brown. In the pre group period only a very few varied from this norm, with red in place of the brown perhaps. Not until the Great Central standardised on green in 1912, (by which time ready mixed paint was becoming available), did things really become more colourful with the SR following suit and the LMS and LNER finally becoming a bit more adventurous in the late 1930s. Looking back it is difficult to understand the lack of interest in displaying stations to the best effect when they were the one place that was commonly experienced by the travelling public. Great care was taken with elaborate locomotive and coach liveries, but stations were often dingy and unappealing; the LMS hardly laid a paint brush on one until 1936 by which time the pre group paintwork was getting past its best! Perhaps this is why modellers so often seem to lavish all their attention on the trains; its really just a continuation of the same attitude. To me though, the railway buildings are just as important and it should be possible to identify a company on a model railway with no trains in view, just from the buildings and the other infrastructure. Until now, it has been possible to plead lack of information. Now youve got no excuse!
